

Iconic Species

What are iconic species?

Iconic species are animals or plants that are important to cultural identity as shown by their involvement in traditional activities such as local ethnic or religious practices and/or which are locally or more broadly recognized for their existence and aesthetic values.

Marine species may be iconic not only to people living near them, but also to those who live far away and may never even see them, but still derive a sense of identity or value from knowing that such species exist.

How is this goal measured?

People derive a sense of identity or value from living near the Baltic sea, visiting coastal or marine locations or just knowing that such places and their characteristic species exist.

The 'Sense of Place' goal tries to capture the aspects of the coastal and marine system that people value as part of their cultural identity by measuring two subgoals: the condition of iconic species and the condition of lasting special places, and together symbolize the cultural, spiritual, aesthetic and other intangible benefits that people value for a region.
